Godzilla vs. Barubaroi Book version

By Finn Duffy and Koichi Kawakita, Hideki Oka

After the death of the original Godzilla in 1954, a mysterious organism is captured in Tokyo Bay where the Oxygen Destroyer was used, and is later brought to the Yamane Paleontology Lab. After consuming a Japanese rice fish and transforming, it is discovered the mystery creature evolves by preying on other creatures.

Studies on the enigmatic specimen named "Barubaroi" continue as it predates on various Japanese wildlife, including a spider crab, a giant salamander, and an octopus.

40 years pass, and the creature remains confined in a small aquarium.

Eventually, G-Force shows interest in the shapeshifting anomoly and wish to monitor it themselves. However, after being moved to a G-Force lab, the creature runs rampant and ends up being burned to cinders with a flamethrower. Unbeknownst to G-Force, fragments of Barubaroi escape the lab and make their way to the outside world.

Now free, Barubaroi begins growing rapidly as it feasts on South Sea insects and gains the ability to fly. It also consumes pieces of Godzilla on Birth Island and becomes capable of emitting an atomic ray, steadily growing larger and more powerful.

As time goes on, the transforming monstrosity begins traveling the globe, fighting and consuming other monsters including a species of Anguirus, its body forming numerous heads and eyes and growing taller than Godzilla himself.

Barubaroi then reaches its final evolutionary form and does battle against Godzilla Junior and Godzilla for planetary dominance - all the while, G-Force deals with conspiracies surrounding the United Nations, with Commander Takaki Aso pushing for the completion of the GOH-TEN to unleash the ultimate weapon: the Neo Oxygen Destroyer.
